

FBI Draws Up a Plan To Probe Any Future Killings of Presidents

FBI Director William Webster has a new contingency plan for investigating any future assassination of a president or other elected U.S. official, FBI sources say.

The FBI director was called before the House Assassinations Committee today to spell out details of the plan, which was developed to avoid deficiencies such as those in the investigation of President John Kennedy's murder.

The House committee disclosed at public hearings in October that Kennedy's autopsy put one of the bullet wounds four inches too low, an error that supported speculation of a second assassin.

The four-inch autopsy error clouded the Warren Commission's conclusion that Lee Harvey Oswald fired both shots that hit Kennedy in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963.

The autopsy placement of the second bullet entry wound on the back of Kennedy's head would indicate that the bullet was fired by a second gunman from a point lower than Oswald's sixth-floor window.

The Warren Commission tried to explain the discrepancy by suggesting that Kennedy's head was bent far forward when the bullet hit, but movies clearly show that it was not.

Committee experts said X-rays show that the bullet actually hit higher — and that tracing the bullet path out of the correct wound location shows that it was fired from the sixth-floor window.
